A word from the Praeses

Hello, my colleagues!

I really hope you enjoyed the last T-Magazine, because it's time for the next one! In this edition, I'd love to tell you about our ski week and, of course, our ski trip.

The Industria ski trip is an event I've had the pleasure of helping organize three years in a row now, and it's exactly why I think it's so amazing!

This year we're heading to Les Sybelles, a ski resort in the French Alps with over 300 km of pistes. And of course, the Industria ski trip wouldn't be the Industria ski trip if we didn't bring our own festival to the mountains! So you're guaranteed a week full of fun on and off the slopes.

See you there (hopefully)!
Tim

Frituursnack of the week

The vleeskroket – a mysterious snack with a mysterious origin.

The crispy, golden-brown crust on the outside of this snack leaves to the imagination what you're about to encounter on the inside. And then you take your first bite: a rich creamy, meaty filling. The perfect contrast between crunch and squish.

Of course, not everyone is convinced. For some, the vleeskroket is one of the greatest inventions in the history of fried food. For others, the vleeskroket is the result of deep fried meat scraps.

The basic idea behind the snack is actually quite practical. Leftover meat could be turned into a rich stew, coated in breadcrumbs and fried, instead of being thrown away. Reduce, reuse, recycle!

Furthermore you'll see that the meaty snack doesn't have the most original shape, as it's basically just a long, stretched out version of its long-lost cousin, the bitterbal. Same idea, different shape.

Now even though the vleeskroket is a true staple in a Belgian frituur, it actually originated in France, when the cook of King Louis XIV described an early variant of this snack in the 1700s. Why Louis XIV wanted a long, meaty snack in his mouth? The world may never know...

What also may be surprising to some, is that the vleeskroket wasn't always the cheap and easy snack we know today. For a long time, croquettes were considered a luxury dish for the elites and the wealthy. Only later, especially after the WW2, did they make their way into snack bars and become part of everyday food culture.

So, even though the actual content of a vleeskroket, to this day, remains a mystery for most, it might be best not to ask too many questions and to just enjoy the mystery, with some extra mayonnaise.

Quaestors & Ab Actis

Our quaestors, Marti and Manosj, manage the financial operations of Industria in a two-person finance team. They build, track and execute budgets while processing all transactions and invoicing. Basically wherever money is involved, so are they.

The Ab Actis, Witse, does the administrative work behind the union, which entails meeting reports, room reservations, shifts and behind the scenes work.

Good Eats

Foodplace of the week: Thai House

Just a short walk from Recup, at Alfons Smetsplein 11, you'll find a real Leuven classic. Thai House has been around since the early '90s as the city's very first Thai restaurant, and it's still run by a Thai family. Don't expect fancy decor or a three-course dinner: this is fast, fresh Thai street food, made for a student budget.

The crowd favourite is the pad thai (with chicken or tofu), and for around €5 you can get a medium portion that will fill you up. Red curry and crispy spring rolls are also popular, and on Fridays and Saturdays they serve a noodle soup at lunchtime. Tip: come a bit before or after the lunch rush, because there is often a queue (which says enough).
